Workplace Violence at Schools – Maintaining Safe Interactions: Setting Boundaries Picture This

In the image, a teacher is seen crouching and shielding themselves as students throw objects in the classroom. This unsettling scenario highlights a serious issue in schools: workplace violence stemming from a lack of boundaries and discipline. Such actions not only endanger the teacher's physical and emotional well-being but also disrupt the classroom atmosphere, making it difficult for both educators and students to focus on learning.

This situation underscores the critical need for establishing and enforcing clear behavioural expectations in schools. Administrators should implement firm policies against aggressive behaviour, provide teachers with training in de-escalation techniques, and promote a culture of mutual respect. Additionally, schools should provide support systems for educators, including counseling services and clear protocols for reporting and addressing incidents. By establishing and reinforcing boundaries, schools can create a secure and productive environment for both teachers and students.
